DRESSES FOR COLD WEATHER

spun Affeire, Embroidered Clotha, Pineb, Celvet, &c.

Harper's Bazar, in its current issue, says: The fashionable modistes who remained latest in Paris and London in search of novelties have confirmed the return to plush and velvet, and the preference of wool for day-dresses for the street. They are now busy pre-paring winter outfits consisting of Eng-lish homespun tailor-made suits for morning; more elaborate cloth cos-tumes, with embroidery or fur trim-mings combined with velvet or plush, for afternoon visits and for church; costumes of velvet or plush for day re-ceptions; trained dresses of velvet and Bengaline for dinners and evening en-tertainments, with ball-dresses of tulle, wathered silk, and satin. HOMESPUN SUITS.

The homespun suits are in the simplest tailor styles, entirely of one material, with no triming other than opens all the way down the back stitched edges and some very large butstitched edges and some very large buttons. The fabric is rough-surfaced wool, either plainly woven or in wide diagonals, and may be either plain brown or lead color, or else in blocks or stripes, or flecked with white like the snowflake cloths so popular in Europe. The skirts have pleated fronts, side panels, and long back drapery of a single breadth of the fabric pleated to the blet across two of its four sides, making the pointed effect intraduced the skirt of mouse-colored Represime making the pointed effect intenduced last winter; sometimes a deep peron is arranged in the same way. The large metallic buttons are used on the skirt, from six to eight being set at wide intervals down each side.

dull-blue velves, with side panels on the skirt of mouse-colored Bengaline and of the same value are of the mouse-colored Bengaline. Another new fancy on these as on other skirts that are in pleats and panels, instead of having drapery, is that of having large side-pockets of the material set on each hip; these are almost ample enough to take the place of paniers, as they are ten inches wide and about six inches deep; they are stitched all around with a wide hem or a turned-over flap at the top, and on this flap are three large buttons of metal or of colored bone. The basque is the plainest postilion, with small buttons up the front, revers turned back, and three large buttons set each side on the upper part of the revers. At present this gown is worn on the street without a wrap, but later on it will need a small jacket or long ulster to give sufficient warmth : either of these garments can be made of the dress goods, but the English fashion is to have this negligee wrap of heavier homespun in checks, blocks, or stripes, using this garment with various dresses. The navy-blue diagonals and other serges worn by young ladies who object to the sober gray or brown homespuns are trimmed with smooth mohair braid not heavier than that used for skirt binding, but wider (about an inch and a half in width), and passing in many rows around the lower skirt, but only showing at intervals under the very long drapery on the front and back; either red or black braid may be used on blue. A pretty pleated jacket with a belt and hood completes such a suit. This suit is within the means of all shades in 54-INCH-WIDE BURRETTES. | the economist, as the fabric is inexpensive, and it may be made up over an alpaca foundation skirt. The amateur LL-WOOL BLACK 86-INCH-WIDE dressmaker is reminded that it must be made in a very plain and simple style to be in good taste, and that its characteristic features are its long draperies, wide pleats, the absence of flounces, and the perfect fit of its short postilion

> BASKET-CLOTH, CAMEL'S-HAIR, ETC. Basket-cloth costumes combined with velvet are more dressy than those of homespun, and are suitable for brides' travelling dresses and for young ladies to wear in the afternoon. Olive, brown, green, and dull-red are used for these, with velvet or plush to match or in contrast. Thus seal-brown basket-cloth is over a green plush skirt, and the short jacket may be of plush also. India camel's-hair in fawn-color and brown shades is used in such costumes for long polonaises, bordered with wide plush galloons, or with a border woven in the camel's-hair, opening over a skirt of dull-blue velvet or of brown

A similar velvet costume for a young lady just going out of mourning is of purplish-black Genoa velvet, made without a particle of trimming, and with the long overdraperies, which, aside from their gracefulness, commend themselves by the fact that they do not cut up the rich fabric into small pieces. DETAILS AND USEFUL HINTS. A simple and new way of finishing the back forms of basques is to shape them in four scallons, one in each form. and to line them with satin. Below these are two larger scallops, gathered at the top and sewed underneath the two middle scallops of the four forms. In other basques, especially those of velvet, only two scallops are seen, one in each of the middle forms of the back. The short side-forms are then separated about two inches from these and pointed below. An easy and stylish way of trimming sleeves is to use inchstead of cuffs. Begin by sewing it at the end of the sleeve at its outside seam. crossing to the inside seam, then taking it gradually upward far enough to come back on the front just above the row that is already there, stopping there when half way across, finishing by turning in the ends in a point. The economist is advised to use watered silks in remodelling last season's dresses of cloth or velvet, and in combining with cashmere for house dresses. Black cashmere, draped over black watered silk, remains a favorite for house dresses. The heliotrope colors are also especially liked in these two fabrics. A smooth cloth basque of dark brown, red, gray, or blue, is in great favor for wearing with back on the front just above the row that is already there, stopping there basque of dark brown, red, gray, or blue, is in great favor for wearing with skirts left over from last winter, and is in keeping with skirts of striped woollens, and also with plain wools of a lighter shade.
